Market outlook

In the morning session, the VN-Index moved in a narrow range below the reference level. Strong selling pressure occurred in the afternoon at the stocks that dragged the index down sharply although VHM and VIC still gained. The strong selling pressure of foreign investors together with the weak demand of domestic investors made the sentiment of the market weak and surplus plunged if penetration of the support threshold of 960 points. BSC recommends investors to hold cash and avoid disbursements in the current period.

Technical Analysis

VN-Index_Testing support 960 points

Comment: The indicators are negative as RSI goes oversold and MACD declined again. However, the VN-Index needs to test the support at 960 on weekly chart. With the current downtrend, a strong bottom-fishing demand is needed to diminish the current bearish sentiment. Order matching volume of about 200 million shares in a session is necessary for the time being. If market sentiment continues to be bad and the index falls below 960 points, it is likely that the VN-Index will fall to the 850 level and the market needs more time to recover psychologically after the sharp decline.

Derivatives market

VN30-Index fell below SMA200, dragging down the sharp decline of the Futures. The spread between the Futures and the VN30 were -0.7%, -0.03%, 1% and 5.5%, respectively. Trading value decreased by 11% to VND7,393 billion. Total bid volume was 0.99 times of the put volume; Average buy and sell orders are equal and equal 3.1 contracts. VN30 penetrated the SMA200 with the average liquidity reduced after a recovery session with low liquidity. The RSI turned back into the oversold zone, while prices fell below the lower Bollinger Band, with the bollinger band extending downward. Downside pressure is still very strong. If the price action occurs, the downward trend will continue if the liquidity in the recovery session remains low. The downtrend was strengthened and the gap between -0.7% and 6 points between 1806 and the VN30 did not diminish the attractiveness of short positions early next week.
